

Facebook and the Rohingya Genocide
Amy Elyse Gordon

Does the article make us question how we in the United States generally view Facebook and other social media platforms?

How do you understand Facebook's role in the Rohingya genocide? How culpable or responsible or blameworthy is it?

What do you find more problematic, the fact that Facebook can be so easily weaponised or Facebook's response to these occurrences?

While Facebook claims to be merely an open platform for free expression of diverse viewpoints, it also represents a public utility relied on by a vast number of people for accurate information. How should Facebook be regulated? What kind of government oversight might be appropriate? Who should Facebook have to answer to?
